Nebraska’s Great Secret

More than two hundred people gathered near Elkhorn on June 29 to dedicate Nebraska’s 500th historical marker. It was unveiled along a brick-paved remnant of the Lincoln Highway, America’s first transcontinental automotive roadway. Speakers included State Senator Beau McCoy and author Drake Hokanson, whose comments are reproduced here and take the place of this issue’s director’s column:

Nebraskans, I’ve figured out your secret.
As a former Coloradan, former Californian, former Iowan, sometimes Minnesotan, and resident Wisconsinite, I want you all to know that long ago I figured out why Nebraskans love their state so much, and why most visitors aren’t so impressed.

After all, I know your state well. I have eaten steak in Scottsbluff, sushi in Lincoln; I’ve camped amidst the meadowlarks in the Sandhills. I’ve visited your museums, done research in your libraries, photographed livestock auctions, attended your county fairs. I’ve visited all your counties and made photographs in most of them, been chased by your tornadoes, awed by your blizzards. I’ve landed my plane at many of your airports. I’ve even ridden freight trains across the state.

In fact the first time I ever saw this piece of brick highway was from an open gondola many years ago, going west on the Union Pacific. Could that be a piece of the old Lincoln Highway, I wondered?

As we all know, most travelers who cross your state do so on Interstate 80—straight, flat, seventy-five miles per hour. “Boring,” they all say, “450 miles of nothing.”

You’re not doing it right, I tell them. Did you get off the interstate? Did you stop to see the Oregon and California Trail wagon ruts on California Hill west of Brule? Did you tour the hay bale church in Arthur? What about the Lewis and Clark campsite in Knox County? And for heaven’s sake, did you have your picture taken in front of Carhenge in Alliance? No?

Then you’re not doing it right.

And to those jaded travelers I say, did you stop and read any of Nebraska’s 499 state historical markers? If you had, you’d have learned about the Otos, the Pawnee, the Ponca, the Oglala Sioux. You would have learned about the Slovaks, the Germans, the Irish, and the Danish; about Willa Cather and Mari Sandoz.

But what about scenic beauty? Ah, Nebraska, you are clever.

States with low self-esteem like Colorado and Montana often post signs with arrows that say “scenic overlook,” or “camera viewpoint.” Not Nebraska. In fact, in your state I can recall seeing only one such pandering attempt to engage the unthinking tourist. A state like Nebraska has no need to point out its scenic wonders. Nebraska says if you can’t figure out for yourself that the entire state is a scenic wonder, you should go to New Mexico. Seriously—have you seen a sunset in the Sandhills? Have you noticed our magnificent thunderstorms? Have you watched the wind comb the prairie on a summer afternoon? Mountains are fine, but they’re for people with stunted imaginations.

And as of today, travelers—and locals—with a bit of curiosity will discover the Lincoln Highway via the latest, the 500th, state historical marker, right here on what has to be the most significant piece of early Lincoln Highway along its entire 3,300-mile route. Nowhere else will you find such a fine extent of early road so well preserved. It is our own Yellow Brick Road.

And it is fitting that Boy Scout Troop 407 of Omaha is here today to help us dedicate this marker. In 1928, after the Lincoln Highway had been absorbed into the federal numbered highway system, Boy Scout troops across the nation set thousands of concrete markers to dedicate this highway to the memory of Abraham Lincoln.

One hundred years ago, the Lincoln Highway was established as the nation’s first transcontinental highway, connecting New York City and San Francisco. It galvanized the nation just as we were falling in love with the automobile. For decades it was America’s premier auto route, inspiring songs, a radio show, and hundreds of thousands of auto travelers who set out to explore their own country.

One of them, Frederic Van de Water, an effete New Yorker, along with his wife and son, crossed this state in 1927 and likely drove this exact bit of road. He wrote:

From grain elevator to grain elevator, we laid our course through Nebraska, traveling over a terrain that grew continually stranger to eastern eyes and a heat that amazed and almost frightened even New Yorkers who have spent summers in town. It smote us the morning we left Grand Island and remained with us, despite increasing altitude, for thirty-six hours.

Clearly Van de Water did not learn Nebraska’s secret. But others at least understood something of the immense beauty of the state and its skies. Bellamy Partridge drove west in 1912, long before any of the Lincoln Highway was paved. He wrote:

We had just splashed through the mudholes at a place called Big Springs when we ran up a longish grade and came out on the top of a tableland where for the first time we found ourselves on the plains—the western prairies of song and story.

As I looked all around and saw nothing but space—and so much of it—a feeling of loneliness came over me. Without realizing what I was doing I stopped the car and shut off the engine.

I listened intently for the music of the spheres, the whispering of the stars passing overhead in the daytime, the swishing of the planets through the immeasurable nothingness—but I couldn’t hear a thing.
Ah, Nebraska—tell me of your deep history, the great pathways of the American story. Indian trails along the Platte, the Oregon Trail, the Mormon Trail, the Pony Express, the transcontinental telegraph and transcontinental railroad; the Lincoln Highway and even the transcontinental airmail. Show me your prairies, your rivers, your wind and sky.

Finally, I think Nebraska’s great secret can be summed up in a new state slogan. Not that there is anything wrong with “Cornhusker State”—direct, unsentimental, just like Nebraskans themselves.
This isn’t “The Enchantment State,” like New Mexico;
it isn’t “The Tomato State,” like New Jersey once boasted, nor “The Baked Bean State” as was Massachusetts once.

No, Nebraska is the “Imagination State”—no, not quite. The “Subtle State”—no, not that either.
Wait, here it is: “Nebraska—The Pay Attention State.”

Historic Preservation
Conference a Success

“B”uilding Communities: Preservation is Place-making,” NSHS’s first annual state historic preservation conference, was held at the Fort Omaha campus of Metropolitan Community College in Omaha on June 14. The event attracted more than a hundred attendees who heard nationally known speakers and learned about financial and planning tools for revitalizing neighborhoods and downtowns, econo-ic benefits of preservation at the local level, and how preservation can help sustain the sense of place found in all communities. Architects and planners earned continuing education credits through their participation.

The Nebraska Arts Council co-sponsored a pre-conference reception, and following the conference the Douglas County Historical Society hosted a reception at the Crook House on the Fort Omaha campus. The conference was supported by grants from the Nebraska Department of Economic Development and Humanities Nebraska.

New NSHS Book Reveals “A Brave Soldier & Honest Gentleman”

Lt. James E. H. Foster (1848-83) lived a short but eventful life as a junior officer on the Northern Plains. His story—and his illustrated journal—provide a rich portrait of the frontier army at the time of the Great Sioux War, when Nebraska was a fledgling state. NSHS curator Thomas R. Buecker shares this story in A Brave Soldier & Honest Gentleman: Lt. James E. H. Foster in the West, 1873-1881, to be published by the NSHS November 1, 2013.

Stationed at Fort McPherson, Nebraska, Foster traveled with the Jenney Expedition of 1875, filling in the large blank area on the map of the Black Hills, and making some of the earliest surviving artistic renditions of the area.

The Black Hills, of course, were not unknown to the Lakotas, who resented the invasion of gold miners and resisted the U.S. government’s attempts to buy the Hills. When war erupted in 1876, Foster rode with General Crook’s forces, fighting at the Battle of the Rosebud and enduring the infamous Starvation March.

Relying on correspondence, army records, and other documents from the time, historian Thomas R. Buecker reconstructs Foster’s life, interweaving his narrative with Foster’s own words. Now published for the first time, all illustrations from the journal (plus several more published by Foster elsewhere) are reproduced here, along with the journal’s complete transcribed text.

For his own part, Foster was a gifted writer and an astute and witty observer of military life. His story increases our knowledge of the American West and the important role played in it by the frontier army.

Foster’s journal is in the collections of the Museum of Nebraska Art in Kearney, which authorized this publication. The book was made possible in part by support from the Ronald K. and Judith M. Stolz Parks Publishing Fund established at the Nebraska State Historical Society Foundation.

The 210-page hardcover is available for $29.95 ($26.95 for NSHS members) from the NSHS Landmark Stores, 402-471-3447. Go to nebraskahistory.org/foster to preview the book.

Tom Buecker will present a brief program on Foster at 1:30 p.m., November 17, at the Nebraska History Museum. A book signing will be held in the Landmark Store at the conclusion of his remarks. For more information call 402-471-3447.

“Lieutenant Foster’s story is chock full of fresh data on the Great Sioux War and the Battle of Rosebud Creek, as well as other period army-Indian activities. Illuminated with Tom Buecker’s astute narration, commentary, and editorial finesse, it comprises a stellar work of profound historical value.” —Jerome A. Greene, author of American Carnage: Wounded Knee 1890 (forthcoming)

NSHS Donates Nebraska’s Post Office Murals to Libraries

James and Rhonda Seacrest were so enthused about L. Robert Puschendorf’s award-winning book, Nebraska’s Post Office Murals: Born of the Depression, Fostered by the New Deal, published by the NSHS last year, they decided to help give it away—to every library in the state!

Their generous financial support initially funded the book’s publication and now is making a copy accessible to all Nebraskans at their local libraries. Copies will be distributed to librarians at the Nebraska Library Association’s annual meeting in Kearney, October 9-11. The Nebraska Library Commission and volunteers from the Kearney Area Chamber of Commerce are assisting with transportation and distribution.

The book will be recognized with an Award of Merit by the American Association for State and Local History in September in Birmingham, Alabama. AASLH Leadership in History Awards competition is the nation’s most prestigious for recognition of achievement in state and local history.

The book is available for $29.95 ($26.95 for NSHS members) from the NSHS Landmark Stores, 402-471-3447.
NSHS Hosts Ten-State Conference for Museum Professionals

The Mountain-Plains Museums Association (MPMA) will hold its annual conference in Lincoln September 30 through October 3. The NSHS is hosting the event. Museum professionals from the region will gather to “explore, share, learn and advance our collective and individual museum skills.” Several members of the NSHS staff will share their expertise during conference sessions. This year’s theme is “Building the Museum Community: Inside, Outside, All Around the Town.”

In June, NSHS Director/CEO Mike Smith was elected president of the MPMA’s board of directors. Smith has been serving as the organization’s vice president since 2011.

At the conference awards banquet, the MPMA will present the NSHS with its Leadership and Innovation Award in recognition of “We the People”: The Nebraska Viewpoint, a project that explored civil liberties through a traveling exhibit, public programming, a special double issue of Nebraska History, and other educational resources.

Lincoln Teacher Honored

Sarah Winans of Kloefkorn Elementary in Lincoln has been named the 2013 Nebraska History Teacher of the Year by the History Channel and two national history preservation groups. Winans is an alumna of (and currently a teacher leader for) Nebraska Wesleyan University’s Master of Historical Studies program, with which the NSHS has partnered via the Nebraska Institute, a program for teaching Nebraska history with an emphasis on primary sources and critical thinking skills. Not surprisingly, Winans, a fourth-grade teacher and a North Platte native, told the Lincoln Journal Star that she uses many primary sources (original documents) in her class and that the study of history is “a good way to teach kids to be good citizens and critical thinkers.” She is currently pursuing a second master’s degree through Doane College and is involved in writing a social studies curriculum for Lincoln Public Schools.

Peru State Students Help Auburn with National Register Bid

Auburn, Nebraska, is nominating its commercial “main street” and courthouse square to the National Register of Historic Places, and Peru State College students are helping with the research. National Register status would provide the city with an important tool for revitalization; the students are gaining valuable real-world experience through the nomination process.

The City of Auburn recently became Nebraska’s seventh Certified Local Government historic preservation program. The CLG program recognizes governments that have established a local historic preservation program to survey and maintain historic properties, and it can provide training and grants to help a city do preservation work.

Students in Dr. Sara Crook’s History of Nebraska course are helping with the National Register research project. Students were each assigned a group of buildings to research. The partnership was set up through Julie Taylor-Costello, director of Peru State’s Institute of Community Engagement, and Kim Beger, administrative assistant for the City of Auburn.

Students kicked off their research at a reception that invited community members to share what they knew about buildings in Auburn’s downtown main street and courthouse square. Students continued their work over the spring semester using the Auburn library, county assessor’s office, Nemaha Valley Museum, and old phonebooks, among other resources.

Dr. Crook said the project was “a great teaching tool . . . The very first day, [the students] were just so totally overwhelmed because it was so different from anything they’d ever done. I kept saying this is what people do in the real world! If you don’t go into teaching or research, if you work for a public entity, this is the kind of research you’ll be doing.”

At the end of the semester, students presented their work at an open reception for the Auburn community. “It helped us tremendously,” said Beger. “It did surprise me . . . how they really did take what they were doing seriously [and] really got into it. Not all of them looked at it as just a class project.”

Same intersection today. With its distinctive turret, the 1890 “New Opera House” is already listed on the National Register of Historic Places.

Welcome Leslie Fattig

TO THE NSHS FOUNDATION

Dear Nebraska History News Readers,

Although I am not originally from Nebraska, I have been a longtime enthusiast of the state’s history and am excited to hold the position of Executive Director of the Nebraska State Historical Society Foundation. Before my career brought me to the Foundation, I was the founder and president of AmeriMax Financial Corporation. Originally from Chicago, I lived in Frankfort, Illinois, for many years before moving to and calling Auburn, Nebraska, my home. Currently, I’m working toward completion of a Master of Science in Strategic Planning and Business Policy degree to complement my Bachelor of Applied Science in Management degree I earned at Peru State College at the age of fifty. In my spare time, you can find me doing the things I love—whether that be spending time with my children and grandchildren, gardening, golfing, or tending to the Quarter Horses that my husband Marty and I enjoy raising and showing in cutting events around the state.

I would also like to take the opportunity to introduce the Foundation’s business manager, Barbara L’Heureux. Barbara is a graduate of the University of Nebraska-Lincoln with over twenty years of nonprofit accounting experience. Her education and skills have led her to positions at the Nebraska Alumni Association and Madonna Rehabilitation Hospital prior to her position here. In her spare time, Barbara enjoys spending time with her dogs, antiquing, quilting, and gardening.

Together we are excited to help further the mission of the Nebraska State Historical Society Foundation.

Congratulations to NSHS Employee, Manager of the Year

If you’ve done research in the NSHS Library/Archives Reference Room, you’ve probably been helped by Matt Pierson, who was recently named the NSHS’s Employee of the Year for his outstanding service. Manuscripts curator Tom Mooney, who stepped into the role of associate director of the collections division during the year that Deb Arenz was overseas, was named Manager of the Year.
Selected items from the Otoe County Museum of Memories will be displayed at the Nebraska History Museum from late October through December. The museum includes three buildings: the former First Lutheran Church and parsonage, and the Henry Kramer Memorial Building. The church contains reconstructed scenes such as a wedding at the altar and a butcher shop, and artifacts such as quilts and toys. The parsonage features artifacts and displays on Otoe County history, military uniforms and artifacts, quilts, and a large collection relating to the Chick Boyes Players—a traveling act from the 1930s to the 1950s. Big game trophies can be seen in the Henry Kramer Memorial Building.

The museum, located at 366 Poplar Street in Syracuse, is open May 1–September 30, Wednesdays 9:30-10:30 a.m. and Sundays 1:30-4 p.m., and by appointment. 402-269-2355 or 402-269-2571, ocgs.homestead.com/museum.html. Free admission.
The Welsh Heritage Centre in Wymore Opens New Facility During Archives Month

For a quarter century now, October has been set aside for celebration of the importance of archives in our lives and culture. From small private collections to the massive holdings of state and national repositories, the archival record holds enduring value as our collective memory, and those who labor to collect, preserve, and make this record accessible are the caretakers of this memory.

Archives Month is fitting time to dedicate a new archives storage addition to the Welsh Heritage Centre in Wymore. The Welsh Heritage Centre history is short but impressive. While evidence of Welsh immigration existed all throughout the Plains, there was no group or facility committed to caring for it. A small assembly of Wymore residents determined to remedy that in 2000. Starting out with a festival commemorating Welsh folkways, their efforts quickly evolved into establishing a physical repository for artifacts. In 2003 a building was acquired and the Welsh Heritage Centre was born. The facility included an exhibit space, auditorium, gift shop, and library. Over time, a mural depicting Welsh immigration and a Hall of Heroes commemorating prominent Welsh Americans were added. While volunteer-run, the centre is operated with the highest professional standards.

As the Centre increasingly became known, the Welsh North American Association asked it to take on the unique archival materials they held, but could not manage. Other Welsh societies followed suit. The Welsh Heritage Centre found itself in the archives business like never before. The need for a dedicated space for the historically valuable records and papers became clear.

Construction of the Archives addition began this past spring after an aggressive fundraising campaign. The concrete structure is fire-rated, environmentally controlled and is built to withstand a tornado. It includes a housing area for the archival collections, plus additional space for collections processing, cataloging, and scanning.

The Archives’ dedication and grand opening will be held October 5, 2013, as part of the organization’s annual Welsh Heritage Festival. A ribbon cutting will initiate a tour of the facility, and the public is invited to attend. www.welshheritage.org

Coming in Nebraska History

By the early twentieth century physicians were commonly present during childbirth, and local health departments tried to regulate (if not do away with) the traditional practice of midwifery. But many immigrant communities resisted the changes. Rebecca J. Anderson looks specifically at Lincoln’s Volga Germans in “‘Grandma Gable, she brought Ralph’: Midwifery and the Lincoln, Nebraska, Department of Health in the Early Twentieth Century,” in the Winter 2013 issue of Nebraska History.

In the same issue, Lois Arnold traces the lives and careers of the Barbours, a family of eminent paleontologists who did much to establish the field as a modern scientific discipline in Nebraska, and who discovered many of the notable specimens now displayed at Agate Fossil Beds National Monument and the University of Nebraska State Museum at Morrill Hall.

Roger Welsch’s remarks from the 2013 Chief Standing Bear Breakfast, and John Carter’s analysis of the earliest known (and previously unpublished) photograph of the Omaha Stockyards are also featured in the issue.

Look for the magazine in your mailbox the second week of November.
Fire at Chimney Rock!

When the Bayard and Minatare fire departments arrived at Chimney Rock on June 29, they weren't there to put out a fire. They came to start one. Sagebrush had been growing thick around the Ethel & Christopher J. Abbott Visitor Center (an NSHS facility); the solution was a controlled burn to reduce the risk of an uncontrolled fire later.

Charred ground and not a charred building—success!

Ford Center Celebrates Gerald Ford Centennial, New Citizens

In July, the Gerald R. Ford Conservation Center, built on the birthsite of the only Nebraska-born president, honored the centennial of its namesake’s birth by hosting a naturalization ceremony for fifty new citizens from twenty-five countries. The Ford Center, which contains an exhibit on the life of President Ford in addition to conservation laboratories where artifacts and paintings are preserved, also hosted a community open house on his 100th birthday.

In the naturalization ceremony keynote address, NSHS Director and CEO Mike Smith noted that while Ford wasn’t an immigrant, he was born into a broken home (his mother fled an abusive marriage just sixteen days after Ford was born) and his future was as uncertain as the future of many immigrants. “Nothing that happened to him in the first two weeks of his life would have given any clue to the service he would render to his fellow citizens,” Smith said. Likewise, no one knows what service the new citizens or their children may render.

“I do know two things, however. First, you will have the opportunity to render civic service as voters, taxpayers, and active citizens. Second, your civic service is essential to the future of the American republic.”

After the ceremony, the new Americans filled out voter registration forms.
What could be more iconic of mid-twentieth century America than a Western saddle made of plastic? A post-World War II leather shortage prompted Alliance, Nebraska, businessman William B. Vandegrift to experiment with new materials. The first saddle was completed in the fall of 1946 in T. C. “Tommy” Neilson’s saddle shop in Lusk, Wyoming.

The plastic was shaped with heat and glued to a rawhide-covered saddletree. Many different colors were available. Though the saddles were durable, they became slick and brittle during cold weather and never caught on with cowboys and ranchers. However, Roy Rogers, promoted by movie studios as the “King of the Cowboys,” liked the colorful saddles so much he agreed to become a spokesman for the company. Rogers purchased several saddles for use in parades and public appearances.

The company relocated to Scottsbluff, Nebraska, in 1949. Soon, a tornado destroyed the factory and ended the business. In all, Western Plastics produced about sixty saddles during its short life.
