It’s Tuesday, March 1. In today’s issue: Nebraska’s troubled road to statehood, and how we got our state motto; BISON exhibit; How do we preserve current events?; Dewitty, a Black settlement in the Sandhills; Fort Robinson love letter; What happens when Indigenous skeletal remains are found?

Happy Statehood Day!

Nebraska became the 37th state on March 1, 1867—but not everyone was happy about it. Last year, HN’s Chris Goforth told the story of the controversy on 1011Now’s “Pure Nebraska.” Watch it here.

Two artifacts in History Nebraska’s collection also tell the story of the troubled road to Nebraska statehood. These painted skylight windows adorned the US Capitol until they were removed in 1949. One shows the familiar state seal. The other shows the lesser-known seal of Nebraska Territory. The words on each had special meaning to people of the time.

Fighting Words
Before the Nebraska State Seal was adopted in 1867, a territorial seal served a similar purpose. Laid across the top were two words that spelled out red-hot controversy.

“Popular sovereignty” was the slogan associated with the Kansas-Nebraska Act of 1854. This law organized the new territories while repealing the Missouri Compromise of 1820. The compromise had prohibited slavery in the region now occupied by the new territories, but the “Nebraska bill” re-opened the slavery question.

In this context, “Popular Sovereignty” was bitterly resented by the “anti-Nebraska” men who founded the Republican Party. They heard it not as a statement of democratic ideals, but as a euphemism for the expansion of slavery. They feared the entire country would soon be dominated by the Southern planter aristocracy. How “Equality Before the Law” became our state motto

Instead of the controversial “Popular Sovereignty” territorial motto, our state motto is “Equality Before the Law.”

But this, too, was controversial. Did you know that we got our state motto due to a post-Civil War controversy over Black voting rights?

In its proposed state constitution, the Nebraska legislature restricted voting rights to White men. Many northern states already did the same. In 1867 Congress rejected Nebraska’s application for statehood until it dropped that restriction.

This infuriated some Nebraska leaders. They knew that the Republican-dominated Congress meant to force the former Confederate states to allow Black men to vote as a condition of re-admission to the Union. Congress was using Nebraska to set a precedent. And everyone knew that most Black men would vote for the party of Lincoln.

Nebraska changed its constitution, but President Andrew Johnson vetoed the statehood bill, arguing that Congress had no right to tell a state how to manage its elections. Keep reading.

See BISON at the Nebraska History Museum

Last month we told you about BISON, the traveling exhibit at the Nebraska History Museum through May 15. Here’s a mind-blowing fact: The bison population plummeted from an estimated 30 million to only 325 in the United States by 1884.

“Saving the bison from near extinction required a core of concerned individuals that became an international movement of people with conservation ideals, Native Americans, and Great Plains ranchers. Today natural preserves and ranches in all fifty of the United States and all of the Canadian provinces support herds of about 500,000 bison.”
Preserving Current Events

What items will future museum audiences find interesting or important? We can’t know for sure, but History Nebraska collects items related to current events that seem historically significant. This poster was carried at a Black Lives Matter protest in Lincoln on June 11, 2020, during a time of nationwide demonstrations following the murder of George Floyd.

The poster wasn’t made to last. It came to us dirty and partly covered with white duct tape that isn’t going to age well. Conservators had to decide how best to keep this object from deteriorating so that it can help tell the story of 2020 to future museum audiences. Keep reading.
The DeWitty Settlement

In case you missed it, Nebraska Public Media’s Nebraska Stories featured the African American Sandhills town of Dewitty (aka Audacious). Watch it here.

Dewitty is gone, but a State Historical Marker commemorates the site.

Ces of My Heart,

While I am writing this letter you are probably sleeping soundly in your little bundle bed. I bet you make a beautiful picture when you’re asleep. I can just imagine that stray lock of hair falling down your forehead and pointing to your warm, desirable lips. My heart aches with loneliness...
During World War II Barney was stationed at Fort Robinson, where “my heart aches with loneliness.” Margaret lived about ten miles away. Barney’s June 1944 love letter to Margaret is now in our archives. Read it here.

What happens when Indigenous skeletal remains are found?

When human remains are discovered in Nebraska as the result of plowing, construction, or natural erosion, what happens next? State and federal laws regulate how History Nebraska responds. Read more here.
Before the Nebraska State Seal was adopted in 1867, a territorial seal served a similar purpose. A painted glass version was installed in a new skylight ceiling in the U.S. Capitol in 1857. (The state seal was added later.) The glass seals came to History Nebraska after being removed during capitol remodeling in 1949.
The territorial seal shares several features with its state counterpart: a steamboat, river, trees, locomotive, anvil, and distant hills or mountains. It also includes a plow (replaced by a shock of wheat in the state seal), a telegraph line, a U.S. flag and Constitution, and two men: a frontiersman with musket and powder horn, and a prosperous-looking man in a tailcoat and planter’s hat. Other than the land itself, each item represents something transformative; together they illustrate the settlers’ notion of “progress.”

But laid across the top were two words that spelled out red-hot controversy. “Popular sovereignty” was the catchphrase associated with the Kansas-Nebraska Act of 1854. This law organized the new territories while repealing the Missouri Compromise of 1820, which had prohibited slavery in the region where the two territories were later formed. Now the “Nebraska bill” re-opened the slavery question, to be decided by each territory’s citizens.

In this context, “popular sovereignty” was bitterly resented by the “anti-Nebraska” men who founded the Republican Party. They heard it not as a statement of democratic ideals, nor even as a middle way of resolving the nation’s most contentious issue, but as a euphemism for the expansion of slavery. They feared the country would be dominated by the “Slave Power,” as they termed the Southern planter aristocracy.

Nebraska was not expected to become a slave state, though its legislature did not ban slavery until 1861, and only then over the governor’s veto. “Bleeding Kansas,” however, was violently contested, foreshadowing even greater bloodshed during the Civil War.

When Nebraska became a state in 1867, a controversy over Black voting rights led to the adoption of our state motto, ”Equality Before the Law.” Read more.

How 'Equality Before the Law' became our state motto

By David L. Bristow, Editor

In a previous post we looked at Nebraska’s territorial seal. Here is the more familiar state seal, likewise shown on a painted glass skylight window from the US Capitol.
Instead of the controversial “Popular Sovereignty” territorial motto, our state motto is “Equality Before the Law.”

But this, too, was controversial. Did you know that we got our state motto due to a post-Civil War controversy over Black voting rights?

In its proposed state constitution, the Nebraska legislature restricted voting rights to White men. Many northern states already did the same. In 1867 Congress rejected Nebraska’s application for statehood until it dropped that restriction.

This infuriated some Nebraska leaders. They knew that the Republican-dominated Congress meant to force the former Confederate states to allow Black men to vote as a condition of re-admission to the Union. Congress was using Nebraska to set a precedent. And everyone knew that most Black men would vote for the party of Lincoln.

Nebraska changed its constitution, but President Andrew Johnson vetoed the statehood bill, arguing that Congress had no right to tell a state how to manage its own elections. Congress overrode the veto and Nebraska became a state on March 1, 1867.

The state legislature soon adopted the state seal and motto, "Equality Before the Law." Governor David Butler signed the bill into law on June 14. One day later, the legislature ratified the Fourteenth Amendment, which promises "equal protection of the laws" and makes this requirement binding upon the states. "The vote marked the first time Nebraska had joined her sister states in the constitutional amendment process," writes historian James Potter.

Although the motto is partly the result of partisan hardball politics, there was idealism in it as well. Few White Nebraskans embraced social equality, but the notion of legal equality seemed like a proper antidote to the slave system that caused the recent war.

In many ways, even that commitment to legal equality proved short-lived. Following statehood, Black voting rights were not restricted in Nebraska as they were in the South, but Nebraska has a long history of de-facto discrimination in many other areas.

Historian James E. Potter examines the history of the state motto in “Equality Before the Law: Thoughts on the Origin of Nebraska’s State Motto,” Nebraska History 91 (2010): 116-121. (PDF)

Preserving Current Events

It can be difficult to know what objects in present times will be valued in the future. However, the staff at History Nebraska actively seeks to build its collection of objects related to current events. One such object is a poster for the Black Lives Matter march at Southpointe Pavilions in Lincoln, Nebraska that occurred on June 11, 2020. The march took place just two weeks after the murder of George Floyd which sparked demonstrations across the country in the summer of 2020. Posters like this are often seen a temporary and not made to last, but they document important events in local history.
This poster is screen printed in black ink on heavyweight, white, wove paper. The primary concern was that white duct tape was attached to the front of the poster at the top and bottom. The poster also has planar distortions overall and some surface dirt and grime. Although the duct tape was original to the function of the poster, the curator and conservator decided it should be removed before it caused irreversible staining, and structural damage to the paper support.
Paper conservator, Hilary LeFevere, removes the duct tape from the top of the poster.

Hilary LeFevere, paper conservator, surface cleaned the paper support before removing the duct tape. The tape left behind adhesive residue which was removed with a crepe eraser. Removing the adhesive residue disrupted the surface of the paper.
Using a crepe eraser to reduce the adhesive residue left behind by the duct tape
After the tape and adhesive was removed, the paper support was humidified and flattened under weight. A Mylar sleeve was created for the poster to protect it for long-term preservation.

Spread out along the North Loup River west of here, DeWitty, later known as Audacious, was the largest and longest-lasting African American settlement in rural Nebraska. The settlers, including former slaves who had fled to Canada before the Civil War and their descendants, began to arrive in 1906-07, attracted by the 1904 Kinkaid Act’s offer of 640 acres of free land in the Sandhills.

The settlement included a church, store, barber, post office, and baseball team, the North Loup Sluggers, which competed against teams from nearby communities. Three rural schools educated the children. On Independence Day, residents of DeWitty and nearby Brownlee would come together for a rodeo, baseball game, and picnic.

The 1910 census recorded 82 black residents. The number of occupied African American homesteads peaked in 1914, although some settlers had already canceled or sold their claims and moved away.

The black homesteaders, like their white counterparts, found 640 acres in this semi-arid region insufficient for ranching and marginal for farming. The last African American resident left the area in 1936. The last parcel still owned by DeWitty settler descendants was sold in 1993.

Cord of My Heart,

While I am writing this letter you are probably sleeping soundly in your little cradle bed. I bet you make a beautiful picture when you're asleep. I can just imagine that stray lock of hair falling down your forehead and pointing to your warm, desirable lips. My heart aches with loneliness.
I think my arms feel as empty as a fishing creel in the middle of a desert.

One consolation remains to me. Inside of an hour you will be in my arms again, my ears shall ring with your fresh, crystal clear laughter like the music of tiny silver bells. My lips will thrill to your kiss and my heart will soar far up into the night sky to return over coastal water stars and moon. Was it not for my dreams of you, my heart of a rose, life would be unbearable out here.

Until I see you again I shall rely upon the intoxicating memories of you and look forward with exhilarating anticipation to our reunion.

Yours in Stardust

Barney
What Happens When Indigenous Skeletal Remains are Found

All too often, human remains are discovered in Nebraska as the result of plowing, construction, or natural erosion. There are state and federal laws which govern how such circumstances are handled. The first step if suspected human skeletal remains are found is to contact local law enforcement. The police will evaluate the remains to determine if they represent a modern crime scene or missing person case. Once a forensic connection is ruled out, law enforcement will contact the History Nebraska, State Archeology Office (SAO) to conduct an archeological evaluation. If the remains are on federal land, archeologists from the federal agency will conduct the assessment.

In either event, preservation in place is the preferred option but oftentimes this is not possible. One example of preservation in place, is an Indigenous cemetery that was found during development of Eugene T. Mahoney State Park between Lincoln and Omaha. Original plans would have destroyed the site during construction of an access road. Officials from History Nebraska, the Nebraska Game and Parks Commission, and the Nebraska Department of Transportation worked together to avoid the property through re-design.
In many cases, remains have been disinterred or cannot be preserved in place. In those circumstances, SAO staff will take possession and make determinations of age, sex, and most importantly biological affiliation such as: Euroamerican, Native American, or African American. This is done in cooperation with trained physical anthropologists. If remains are believed to be Indigenous, we will work with tribes under the Native American Graves Protection and Repatriation Act (NAGPRA) to determine which tribe or group of tribes the remains should be repatriated to for reburial. Factors considered include: associated funerary artifacts, skeletal features, burial pattern, geographic location, and oral traditions. Since the late 1980s, History Nebraska has repatriated over 1200 sets of human remains and many thousand associated funerary objects to over 35 Indigenous nations and tribes across the Great Plains.

The SAO is presently assisting the Nebraska Commission on Indian Affairs, the Genoa US Indian School Foundation Board, and the University of Nebraska-Lincoln (Center for Great Plains Studies) in attempts to locate the Genoa Indian School cemetery. We have examined maps and conducted ground-penetrating radar surveys but to date no graves have been found.
